The passage, tweeted by feminist author Fern Riddell, sparked a conversation on social media about the over-sexualisation of female characters as she wrote the book had been "written by a man". The paragraph from the book - the name and author of which are not clear - reads: "She caught a fleeting look at herself in the mirror. Somehow, despite the permanent lack of sleep, her body was refusing to give the game away entirely. "Yes, there were dark circles under her eyes, but they gave her an oddly sultry look. Selecting the Very Best Books of any year (or, heaven forbid, of all time) can feel like a daunting exercise, especially in the world of crime fiction, where the books are plentiful, the readers are passionate, and it seems like every month thereâ€™s a new book coming out that pushes the boundaries of what this literature can do. There are many ways to measure the quality of a crime novel, a mystery, or a thriller. Did it follow the rules of the genre? Did it make us feel something? Did it shine a light on a hidden pocket of society? Was the writing spare or rich, hardboiled or poetic? Was it go In 1866 the Russian novelist Fyodor Dostoevsky published Crime and Punishment, one of his greatest novels. Itâ€™s a penetrating study of the psychology of sin, guilt, and redemption, and it haunts the reader long after the final page has been read. It tells the story of an intelligent, but impoverished, young Russian intellectual named Raskolnikov.Â Indeed, when he murders the old pawnbroker and her sister, something within Raskolnikov also dies. The bond that unites him with all other men in a common humanity is destroyedâ€”or â€œdiesâ€ as a sort of poetic justice for murdering the two women.Â Crime and Punishment thus ends on a note of hope, for the guilty can be forgiven and the dead restored to life!
