The structure of health services in the UK after the second world war reflected disparate origins and artificial divisions between different elements, which had persisted for many years. The three main strands, state owned (nationalised) hospitals, a national network of general practitioners and community and domiciliary health services, were financed centrally but managed separately. Throughout the history of the NHS, this initial division of functions between separate statutory organisations created problems in the provision of comprehensive and co-ordinated services. A report published in 1...

"Health services planning" has been described as The National Health Service is the UK's publicly funded healthcare system. Founded on the principle that good healthcare should be available equally to rich and poor alike, the NHS provides treatment 'free at the point of use' for all UK residents. Although funded centrally from taxation, the devolved administrations of Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland are responsible for managing their own NHS services. The RHBs were replaced in 1974 with Regional Health Authorities and in the same year the Ambulance Service became part of the NHS, having previously been controlled by local authority health departments. New principles were also added to the three core principles in July 2000 as part of a modernisation programme. Healthcare plans usually operate on an excess basis, meaning you need to pay a proportion of the cost when you need to use your insurance. Many UK employers include subsidised or tax-only healthcare cover in their benefits packages. It's also possible to pay for private healthcare on a one-off basis, should you need a specific type of treatment or an operation that has a very long waiting time on the NHS. Emergency services are free of charge in the UK. To report an emergency, you can call 999 and have an ambulance dispatched if necessary.
