Paradoxes of Modernity: Culture and Conduct in the Theory of Max Weber

Wolfgang Schluchter

Abstract

One of the world's pre-eminent Max Weber scholars here presents a comprehensive analysis of Weber's ambiguous stance toward modernity considered from a normative, theoretical, and historical point of view. The book is in two parts. Part I scrutinises Weber's world view. On the basis of his thinking about the meaning and inter-relationships of science, politics, and ethics in the modern era, Weber is seen as the embodiment of a social scientist and political thinker who exposes himself to intellectual risks and existential tensions while resisting final solutions. It includes a masterly analysis of Weber's two famous speeches 'Science as a Vocation' and 'Politics as a Vocation'. Part II considers Weber's unfinished project on the sociology of religion. Piecing together planned and partially completed works on Islam and Western Christianity, Schluchter locates them in the history and theory of Weber's overall work. This reconstruction of Weber's work on religion emphasises its interplay between religion, economy, politics, and law.

In the series of classical theories of modernity, there is Max Weber’s theory of rational-bureaucratic society. The social thinkers of this period were concerned with the nature of modern, industrial society. They also deplored the social disorder that seemed to accompany modernization. Weber (1864-1920) was the product and witness of modern industrial society. He responded to the challenges given by his era. The central theme in his work was his concern with the problems of western civilization, especially the rationalization and demystification of all aspects of modern social life.
