Most of us whether we choose to admit it or not show that material things are what we base our lives around. These ideas are at the heart of existentialism, which is a view of life that says that human beings are the creators of their own sense of meaning or purpose. The most famous existentialist, John Paul Sartre in his books and novels developed several themes that portray existentialism. That is a whole other matter. What I mean by the "meaning of life", is the greater picture. There are people all over the world, doing their own thing, living their own lives, in their own areas. Is there a point to this? The "meaning of life" suggests a summarization. Whereas, "meaning in" opens the possibility to why and how the various life roles we have can provide us with meaning. This is the same distinction that Frankl made with global verse situational meaning, "meaning of" referring to the global meaning and "meaning in" to situational meaning. What we can learn from Dave's remark and from Frankl's distinction is that the "meaning of meaning" changes depending on both its context and the perspective we take. That is one reason, to me, that it seems absurd to consider "meaning" as a word complete in Everyone knows why we are here. A woman chants, "Hey hey! Ho-ho!
