Why Philippe Diaz has titled his new documentary “The End of Poverty?” is unclear, because this guilt trip history lesson is really about the
In 2005, word leaders said that they were going to MAKE POVERTY HISTORY. Because of public pressure they made some big promises to increase aid and cancel many poor countries' debts. But if 2005 was supposed to be the start of a global movement to end poverty, Kay didn't see it. She and her family have to survive on just three pence per day. And there are millions of children like her. So, today we are telling our governments that Kay and children like her CAN'T WAIT. In reviewing the history of thought on poverty, I was struck by how much mainstream thinking has changed over the last 200 years. We see a transition in the literature and policy debates between two radically different views of poverty. Early on, there was little reason to think that poor people had the potential to be anything other than poor; poverty would inevitably persist.
