Now Ruskin held Turner to be the greatest landscape painter the world had seen, and he immediately wrote a notable article in his defense. Slowly this article grew into a pamphlet, and the pamphlet into a book, the first volume of "Modern Painters." The young man awoke to find himself famous. For John Ruskin, the country of Italy was a vital part of life, and it strongly influenced his way of thinking. Like the Lake District, it was a refuge and place of rehabilitation in times of illness and upset, and he made nearly twenty separate visits there between 1833 and 1888. At the age of thirteen, Ruskin was given Roger's Italy and was awed by the Turner vignettes of the Italian landscape. This gift inspired him to continue to develop his drawing and perception skills, which are recorded in the pictures and diaries of his travels.
